

The Bronte Trail

Branwell's sketch of Monks' Lodge

From 1840 to 1845, Anne Bronte was employed as a governess to the Robinson family at Thorpe Green Hall. Her brother Branwell was also employed there for some of that time. The people and surroundings inspired literary work by both of them. Follow in their footsteps today, as you take the Bronte Trail.

Great Ouseburn is mentioned in the Domesday Book and it's near here the Ouse Gill Beck rises and, where it joins the Ure nearby, forms the River Ouse. In 1840 around 30 retail establishments traded in the village supplying the day-to-day needs of Anne and Branwell.

Walk Information

The full walk is five miles (8km) long and should take around two-and-a-half hours at a steady pace. Start at the walk interpretation panel on Great Ouseburn Village Hall. There is ample parking.

Follow the route shown by the green waymarkers. Thorpe Green Lane can be busy at the start and end of the school day.

OS Map Explorer 299 covers the area.

Farmland birds to look out for include skylark (pictured) and yellowhammer, especially in spring, and finch and sparrow flocks on autumn stubble. With luck the ghostly form of the barn owl might be seen hunting for rodents.

The Route

Our trail begins as we walk along Main Street, heading for St Mary's Church. Then left through the churchyard, which contains a railed obelisk in memory of Dr John Crosby, a good friend of Branwell's.

Following country lanes and a short stretch of road we turn onto Mill Lane. In 1842, at Long Plantation, Anne Bronte wrote her three-verse poem Lines Composed in a Wood on a Windy Day, which was published in 1846 under her pen-name of Acton Bell.

Kirby Hall was demolished in the 1920's but in the distance some of the service buildings can still be seen. It was still a fine Palladian-style mansion when Anne used it as an influence for Ashby Hall in her novel Agnes Grey, published in 1847.

(To shorten the walk, take the bridleway from Low Farm up to Thorpe Green Lane and turn right towards Great Ouseburn.)

Beyond Low Farm we use a footpath, known in Anne's day as Bowsers Lane which emerges at Thorp Head, close to the River Ouse. Branwell Bronte's poem Lydia Gisborne begins: "On Ouse's grassy banks - last Whitsuntide, I sat, with fears and pleasures, in my soul commingled, as it 'roamed without control'..."

Moss Hill Lane was Moss Lane in Agnes Grey and at its junction with Thorpe Green Lane we can just glimpse Monks' Lodge above a tall wall, where Branwell stayed. A sketch he did of the building still survives.

On the wall inside Holy Trinity Church is a memorial to the young Edmund Robinson who was taught by Anne and Branwell.

The main building of what is now Queen Ethelburga's College stands on the site of Thorpe Green Hall where Anne was Branwell Bronte. Branwell, who had been employed as tutor to the Robinsons' heir, fell in love with Lydia Robinson (Née Gisborne) and was convinced he would marry her on the death of her husband. That was not to be and, having been dismissed by Mr Robinson in 1845, he fell into a life of drinking and drug use which led to his death only three years later:

Our route now follows the narrow road that Anne and the Robinsons took every Sunday to worship at Holy Trinity Church in Little Ouseburn.

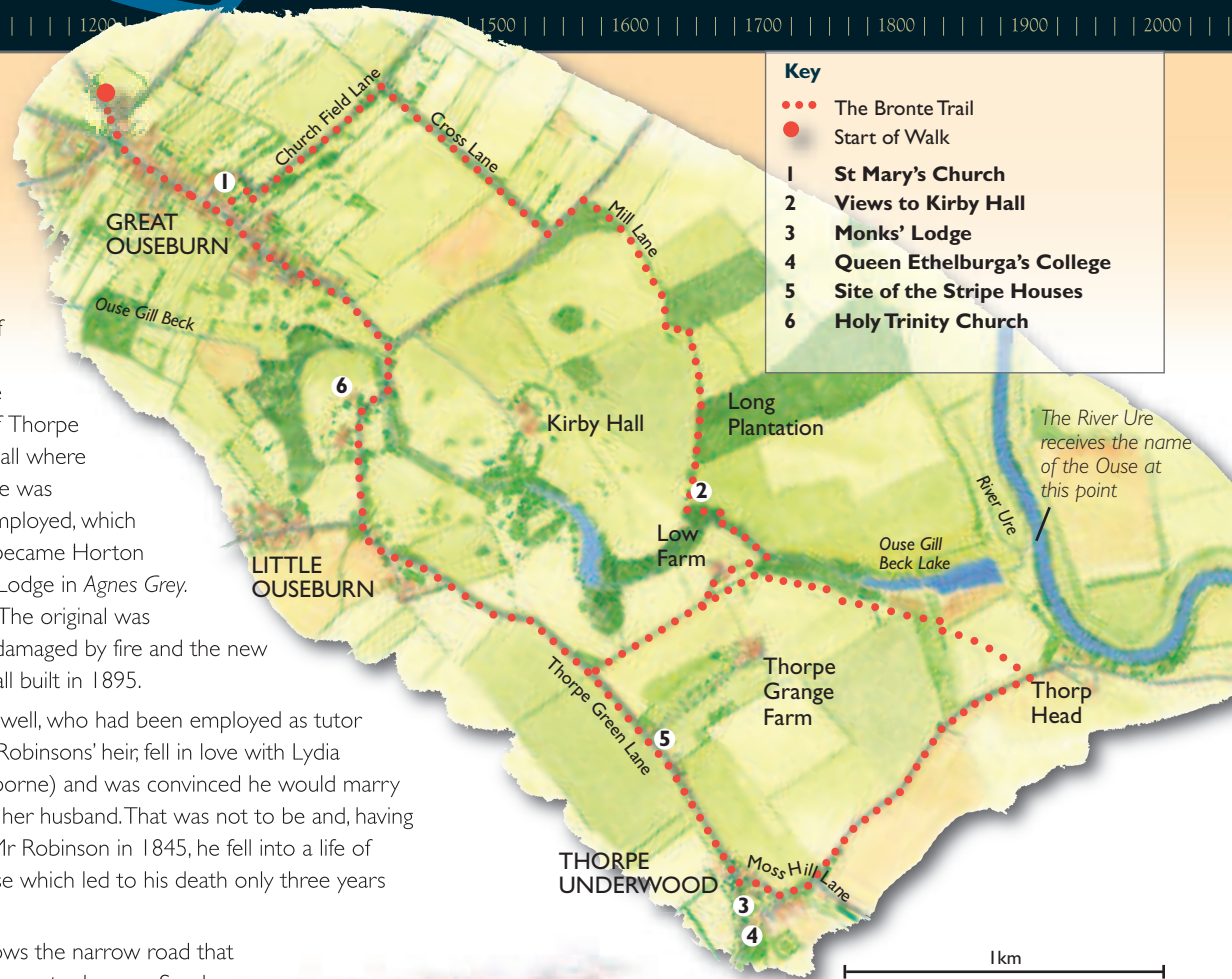

At the entrance to Thorpe Grange Farm the 'ridge and furrow' strips can be seen in the field that gave it's name to the Stripe Houses. Demolished in 1883 they housed the poor families of the area and were the influence for the cottages visited by Agnes and the Murray girls.
